COFFEE WITH BS: PRATHAP C REDDY, FOUNDER-CHAIRMAN, APOLLO HOSPITALS

Hard on the heals

At 92, Reddy, who remains deeply involved with the hospital chain he founded, tells Shine Jacob why he believes the country needs to push for 'Heal in India'

At the Apollo Hospitals corporate office, Sunny Side Building, in the heart of Chennai, as I wait for Prathap C Reddy to meet me, my mind races with questions. I am still thinking of them when the 92-year-old walks into the room, greets me warmly, and takes a seat.

Ninety-two years is a long time. Where does one even begin asking about them? But then, 92 years can give you the ability to read people's minds. The founder-chairman of Apollo Hospitals astutely gauges my predicament, and decides to begin at the beginning — from his village, Aragona, in the Chittoor district of Andhra Pradesh, which has three temples, dedicated to Parameshwara, Rama, and Hanuman, but back in the day had no school. Reddy would have a tutor teach him at 3 pm every day. But before those special classes, he and a group of some 10 friends would climb atop a hill in the village and jump into a water body 20-ft down. Perhaps, behind those heroics was the conviction that no harm would come to them even if they went into freefall from that height. After all, Reddy's was no ordinary village. Legend had it that when Hanuman was transporting the mountain with the sanjeevani booti (life-reviving herb) to save Laxman, half of that mountain fell in this village. Perhaps, it was then destined that Reddy would choose a profession that involved healing.

Decades later, in March 2000, America's then president Bill Clinton would inaugurate the world's first V-SAT-enabled telemedicine centre at Aragona. He would watch a doctor consulting a child from the village with heart disease and assuring her that she would lead a normal life. Describing it as a "wonderful contribution to the healthcare of people who live in rural villages," Clinton had said to Reddy: "... I hope that people all over the world will follow your lead."

As he recounts the event, Reddy searches for photographs from that day in a book. Flipping through its pages, he smiles as he points to some pictures: "This was in my village, Aragona."

Apollo has since had many firsts: The first CT scan, the first MRI, the first proton therapy centre...

We are meeting over coffee. Reddy has an extra small cup. "Whenever I drink coffee, I take only half of this cup," he says. Strict dietary discipline is what keeps him going. His day begins at 6.30 am, followed by a walk, a bath, and then one-and-a-half hours of prayers, during which he reads Sundara Kanda, the fifth book in the Ramayana. "I used to love tennis," he says. "I never missed a Wimbledon semi-final or final for years. Mornings now include fruits; lunch is rice and a piece of fish; and dinner is roti with curd. "I love curd," he says with childlike joy.

From his village, Reddy went on to get a degree in medicine from Stanley Medical College in Chennai, and later trained as a cardiologist in the UK and the US. A fellowship at the Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston followed, and then he headed several research programmes at the Missouri State Chest Hospital. In 1971, he returned to India at the behest of his father who wanted him to serve in India. Eight years later, the death of a 38-year-old heart patient who could not travel abroad for treatment got him thinking about setting up a hospital that would address such a challenge.

The first Apollo hospital was born in 1983, at Chennai's Greaves Road. The name "Apollo" came from his daughter, Suneeta Reddy, who suggested she name it after the Greek god of healing.

It wasn't all smooth, though. Getting loans for healthcare wasn't easy in the time of Licence Raj, and medical equipment was treated as luxury goods, with higher import duties. A meeting with Indira Gandhi, then prime minister, helped get the proposal for the hospital cleared.

Today, Apollo has 73 hospitals, over 10,400 beds, 6,600 pharmacies, 264 clinics, 2,182 diagnostics facilities, and 800 telemedicine centres. It has presence in 25 countries, including the UK, Mauritius, Egypt, Barbados, Bangladesh, Vietnam, Fiji, Bahrain, and Nigeria. There are upcoming projects in Sri Lanka, Ethiopia, Kenya, United Arab Emirates, Saudi Arabia, Samoa, and so on. Reddy's four daughters — Preetha Reddy, Sangita Reddy, Suneeta Reddy, and Shobana Kamineni — are all involved with Apollo Hospitals in various capacities.

Our conversation is interrupted by a member of Reddy's staff, who approaches him with a note. He has a board meeting to attend in one of the coming days. This was proof of him being actively involved in the day-to-day affairs of the group.

Reddy has the kind of presence that fills the room — someone you'd consider making a biopic on. If such a film were to be made, who would play Reddy? "Ram Charan?" I suggest. He laughs out loud. The Telugu superstar is his grandson-in-law. "Do you know Ram Charan is my kid?" he says, sidestepping the question. But add two more. My wife's sister had back pain — it took her three months to finally get the surgery. In India, it happens within hours," he says, stressing the need to promote "Heal in India".

Reddy believes artificial intelligence (AI) has transformed patient care by bringing precision and urgency to the forefront. "Reading an X-ray used to take 20 minutes. Now it's 20 seconds. AI has brought a tremendous shift in healthcare. We were the first to make full use of it," he says. Apollo, through its pro-health programme powered by AI, has conducted more than 25 million health checkups so far.

Asked about what disappoints him, he admits the shift from illness to wellness has been slower than expected. "I spend more time on preventive health than curative health now. Noncommunicable diseases are killing people. We must prevent that," he says.

I press about his taste in films. He smiles and concedes he is not much of a moviegoer — the last one he watched was RRR. "I want everyone to focus on HHH — Health, Happiness @ Home. I put that first." Then, turning reflective, he adds: "From a small micro sperm, God has developed all this. We should take care of that health."

As we wrap up, unlike the usual industrialist, he insists on a photograph. As the shutter clicks, he clasps my hand warmly. The calmness in his handshake is a reminder that, for him, healthcare is as much about human touch as it is about technology.

OpenAI's Sora makes disinformation extremely easy, real

TIFFANY HSU, STUART A THOMPSON & STEVEN LEE MYERS
3 October

In its first three days, users of a new app from OpenAI deployed artificial intelligence to create strikingly realistic videos of ballot fraud, immigration arrests, protests, crimes and attacks on city streets — none of which took place.

The app, called Sora, requires just a text prompt to create almost any footage a user can dream up. Users can also upload images of themselves, allowing their likeness and voice to become incorporated into imaginary scenes.

Sora — as well as Google's Veo 3 and other tools like it — could become increasingly fertile breeding grounds for disinformation and abuse, experts said. While worries about AI's ability to enable misleading content and outright fabrications have risen steadily in recent years, Sora's advances underscore just how much easier such content is to produce, and how much more convincing it is.

OpenAI has said it released the app after extensive safety testing, and experts noted that the company had made an effort to include guardrails.

In tests by The New York Times, the app refused to generate imagery of famous people who had not given their permission and declined prompts that asked for graphic violence. It also denied some prompts asking for political content.

The safeguards, however, were not foolproof.

Sora, which is currently accessible only through an invitation from an existing user, does not require users to verify their accounts — meaning they may be able to sign up with a name and profile image that is not theirs. The app will generate content involving children without issue, as well as content featuring long-dead public figures such as the Rev. Dr Martin Luther King Jr and Michael Jackson.

The app would not produce videos of President Trump or other world leaders. But when asked to create a political rally with attendees wearing "blue and holding signs about rights and freedoms," Sora produced a video featuring the unmistakable voice of former President Barack Obama.

Until recently, videos were reasonably reliable as evidence of actual events, even after it became easy to edit photographs and text in realistic ways. Sora's high-quality video, however, raises the risk that viewers will lose all trust in what they see, experts said. Sora videos feature a moving watermark identifying them as AI creations, but experts said such marks could be edited out with some effort.

"It was somewhat hard to fake, and now that final phase is dying," said Lucas Hansen, a founder of CivAI, a nonprofit that studies the abilities and dangers of artificial intelligence. "There is almost no digital content that can be used to prove that anything in particular happened."

Such an effect is known as the liar's dividend: That increasingly high-caliber AI videos will allow people to dismiss authentic content as fake.

Imagery presented in a fast-moving scroll, as it is on Sora, is conducive to quick impressions but not rigorous fact-checking, experts said. They said the app was capable of generating videos that could spread propaganda and lent credence to conspiracy theories, implicated innocent people in crimes or inflamed volatile situations.

Although the app refused to create images of violence, it willingly depicted convenience store robberies and home intrusions captured on doorbell cameras. Fake and outdated footage has circulated on social media in all recent wars, but the app raises the prospect that such content could be tailor-made and delivered by perceptive algorithms to receptive audiences.
